Clipping size questions - this length and width - and ideal cover designs engage self-published authors, yet often lies with an overlooked decision point typography. Designers distinguish between two key terms: The font is a family of related characters. For example, Helvetica is a font. The font is the preparation of the font in a certain moment. For example, Helvetica Dar Italic is a font. Traditionally, fonts contain a specific point size, but this application -- a wait from the days when fonts consisted of individual letters placed in printing presses -- has largely been replaced by digital printing. Choosing complementary and readable type characters provides a harmonious visual appeal to help your book place it well with readers. Chris Ryan / Getty Images When you read a book, the designer's choice of font is probably not the first thing to notice. That's a good thing, because if the font selection jumped right on you and said look at me, it was probably the wrong font for that book. Follow best practices: Use a serif or sans serif font. The body of the book is not the place for blackletter, script or decorative fonts. In some cases, they can work for section headings or table of contents, but not for main text. Although traditionally most book fonts are serif fonts, they will usually not go horribly wrong with the most classic serif or classic sans serif options. It's inconspilious. For most books, the best font is one that doesn't stand up and yell at the reader. It will not be overly detailed letterforms with excessive x-height, unusually long rises or descendants, or extra flourishes. While a professional designer can see the beauty of each font without a size, for most readers the face is just another font. Stay away from typewriter fonts. Single spaced, such as couriers or other typewriter fonts types. The uniform range between characters causes the text to stand out too much. The exception will be on other text elements, such as section headings or pull quotes, where you might want a more prominent font. Select a font It can be read 14 points or less. The actual font size depends on the specific font, but most books are set in a size between 10 and 14 points. Decorative fonts are usually not legible in these sizes. Set the line spacing. The space between type lines is as important as the specific font and point size. Some fonts may require more line spacing than others to accommodate long ascendant or descendants. However, increasing it can lead to more pages in the leading book. A balancing act with some book designs. Adding about 2 points to the text point size is a good starting point for choosing a leader — so the 12-point type is set with a 14-point line spacing. ANDRZEJ WOJCICKI / Getty Images While it's hard to go wrong with well-known serif classics like Minion, Janson, Sabon and Adobe Garamond, don't be afraid to try a sans serif font like Trade Gothic if it works for design. For digital books, Arial, Georgia, Lucida Sans or Palatino are all standard options because they are installed on most e-readers. Other good book fonts include ITC New Baskerville, Electra and Dante.
